2014 AAP Workshop Held in Chicago

International experts in periodontal regeneration met in Chicago June 2-4 to participate in a workshop entitled “Enhancing Periodontal Health through Regenerative Approaches.” The event was organized by the American Academy of Periodontology (AAP) and led by Drs. Pamela McLain, William Giannobile and Myron Nevins.

The workshop’s objective was to critically appraise current evidence then present interpretive conclusions regarding the effectiveness of regenerative therapy for treating periodontal defects, as well as offering recommendations for future research on this topic. Five groups were established to address different modalities of treatment to regenerate both soft and hard periodontal tissues.

Dr. Gustavo Avila-Ortiz, Department of Periodontics, actively participated in Group 4, which focused on the treatment of furcation defects. Prior to the meeting, Dr. Avila-Ortiz conducted a systematic review aimed at presenting the available evidence regarding the effectiveness of different regenerative approaches for the treatment of furcation defects as compared to conventional surgical therapy. During the meeting, the outcomes of the systematic review, as well as other pertinent sources of evidence, were discussed by a committee of nine members. The group agreed on a consensus summary of the evidence and also formulated recommendations for the treatment of furcation defects via regenerative therapies. The systematic review and the consensus will be published in Journal of Periodontology while the clinical guidelines will be published in Clinical Advances in Periodontics.
